

Scientific Publications and their Open Access Evolution

In 2003, the Berlin declaration on Open Access to Knowledge in the Sciences and Humanities shook the world of scientific publications. It was obvious to everyone that Open Access would become the norm in the next few years. Almost 20 years after this declaration, where are we?

From Open Access to Open Science, from the American ArXiv to the European Plan S, from Green, Gold, Diamond business models to the new S2O (Subscribe to Open) model: the world of publishing has undergone a revolution, but it is far from over and open access is still far from being the norm.
